

Purpose - What am I writing this for?

Writers write adventure stories when they want to tell exciting and interesting stories. These might involve other places and people that the writer finds engaging or entirely different worlds. Adventure stories are filled with plot elements that most readers will be familiar with, like conflict and a clear climax.

The disappearance

There was once one proud zookeeper called Kevin, and he was looking after all the fantastic animals at the Prehistoric Park. He enjoyed cleaning their enclosures, feeding them and welcoming all the jolly visitors every day. But most of all, he adored spending time with his three friends, Seb, the astute coach tiger, Giles, the giggler, and Mel, the maggot, while playing charades, their favourite game.

Mel was very good at this game since she loved to express herself. She always thought she had been a famous actress in her previous life. Seb enjoyed making everyone laugh because he referred to himself as the 'funny guy', always the centre of attention. Giles was always serious. Although he rarely won, he never missed a game and cheered for his friends. However, Kevin was the responsible one. He looked after the game, knew the rules by heart and kept track of the animals.

Until one day, when something peculiar happened. Their special game watched unexpectedly, and Kevin could not find it anywhere. He looked and looked everywhere in the keeper's office, but there was no trace of the game. He frantically searched and searched in the filing cabinet, under his desk and even behind the blinds. The game was nowhere to be found.

Undeterred, he went to ask Seb for help in his quest to find the game.

"What's up, Kevin?" questioned Seb, meticulously brushing his lethal canines.

"I can't find our game!" answered Kevin, scratching his head. "Will you help me find it?"

Together, the two friends looked and looked everywhere in Seb's enclosure, but there was no trace of the game. Determined to succeed, they searched and searched in the bushes, near the pond and even in the dark and cold cave. The game was nowhere to be found.

With a flicker of hope, Kevin and Seb requested Giles to join their hunt for the game.

"What are you two doing?" enquired Giles while rolling on his back.

"We can't find the game. You know, the charades which we often play. Can you help us find it?" implored Kevin with a desperate look on his face.

And so, the three friends attentively looked and looked everywhere in Giles' pen, but there was
